

And the complexities of life we left ashore take on new shape and form, As the simplicity of the sea takes over, Soon again we find ourself passive and concerned merely with existence itself.

Strange how it is that the sea will bring out the good and the truth in man's heart, And at the same time give him courage to boast of salty stories, that could have only been created in his dreams.

For the many who have made the sea a part of their life and the few who are born with the sea embedded in their soul, for them their journeys are real and though unknown or forgotten by others, they will always remain vivid in the minds of these.

But for these who have never tasted the salty spray in their face, they can only continue to create visions in their minds.

Ronald B. Wilton
Seaman, U.S. Coast Guard