

Pete "Doc" Hanno, of Bangkok fame, distinguished himself once again by captivating the patrons of the Malaysia cocktail lounge with his inimitable delivery of some spicy rhetoric. Firmly establishing himself as one of the SPENCER's genuine "characters", Pete was a smashing success.

Being a Bostonian, Jack "Snooker" Burke preferred the more reserved atmosphere of the Britannia Club. But that didn't stop him from endearing himself to the English clientele by demonstrating, while "under the influence," his prowess as a snooker player. They never did recover all of the snooker balls, despite a thorough search of the swimming pool and surrounding shrubbery.

Many people discovered Bugis Street, the Malaysia equivalent of a block party. When the night clubs close, all of Singapore moves to Bugis Street where the beer is cheap and the people are friendly. Watching the action from one of the open air bistros, one marvels at the vast assortment of people who gather here. From rich tourists to broken down derelicts — they can all be found here. Bugis Street may not have any class, but it certainly has atmosphere.

The Malaysia Hotel returned to normal after the jet set re-donned their dress disguises (with neckerchief and flat hat) and checked out. The five days had passed quickly, and the crew of the SPENCER soon found themselves steaming reluctantly out of Singapore harbor with their spirits and wallets somewhat lighter.

